Dexter Mendoza, MD, and Frederic Bertino, MD, of the department of radiology and imaging at Emory University in Atlanta, may have ways to combat it.. “We need to build on this momentum to effect change,” the authors wrote “We ask that radiology leadership, faculty, and trainees begin a dialogue and work together and make steps toward ensuring the well-being of our practice, of its practitioners and of the trainees.. Detailed in an published Sept 19 in Academic Radiology, many radiology stakeholders and department leaders recognize burnout among radiology trainees as an important issue.. ” Several factors contribute to radiology resident burnout, including counterproductive administrative tasks such as procedure logs and training modules, continuous and long clinical shifts, demanding call schedules, technical issues and lack of feedback and social interactions, according to the authors.. Burnout among radiology residents is among the highest compared to other medical subspecialties, with 85 percent of trainees feeling emotional exhaustion, depersonalization and decrease feelings of personal accomplishment.
